

To Students at Waseda University,

The Graduate School of Economics aims to develop researchers who can contribute to a host of emerging fields related to international political science and economics—an area that includes a variety of expert fields of advanced economic studies as well as neighboring topics of academic inquiry. At the same time, the graduate school seeks to develop professionals with the ability to propose, execute, and evaluate specific policies in order to address the political and economic questions facing Japan and the rest of the world in an era characterized by increasing globalization and rapidly developing information technology.

○Students seeking to go into research will gain a solid understanding of the essential theories that guide economic scientists early on in the master's program. This will give them a solid foundation and allow them enter their doctoral studies with a well-defined research topic.

○Those who wish to leave academia for advanced positions in the workforce develop logical thinking skills as they delve deeper into their study of economics. These graduates will also gain fluency with data analysis that will allow them to closely examine economic phenomena and come up with solutions that address the many questions facing our modern world to meet the needs of the twenty-first century.
