

Abstract

It is known that the special morae in Japanese are difficult to perceive and produce for learners who speak Mandarin Chinese as their first language. In this paper, a teaching method using dictation is developed for Mandarin Chinese-speaking learners and its effectiveness is examined. The results show that the method is effective in raising learners' awareness of the special morae and therefore can help them overcome the problems regarding these sounds.